Waldport Institute.

The local teachers' institute and picnic held at Waldport last Saturday was a grand success, although the condition of the weather kept many away and prevented the game of ball and other outdoor sports.

The forenoon session, held in the school building, was well attended, nearly all the school officers in the Waldport school district and surrounding districts being present.

The following Waldport teachers were present:

R. P. Goin, Nellie Graff, Edith Harrison, Ada Harrison, Edgar Crocker, Martha Kent, Mrs. Huoy and Jesse Reese.

The work of the institute began at 10 a. m. in the public school building, with R. P. Goin presiding.

The first numbers on the program were songs by the Waldport choir. They were well rendered and greatly appreciated by the audience.

Superintendent Bethers gave some of his methods of teaching addition, subtraction and multiplication. This work was presented to show the saving of time in the solution of problems and the manner of writing them.

Prof. Horner said that the greatest trouble with book-keepers and accountants is not in their work in subtraction, multiplication and division, but their work in addition is faulty.

Mr. Goin gave a talk on the work of the teacher, which was timely and to the point.

The dinner given on the picnic grounds by the ladies of Waldport, assisted by the sisters from the country, was all that anyone could wish for—cakes and pies of many kinds, bread, butter, salads, beef, pork, crabs, etc.

Dr. Carter and Prof. Horner were at the table and it was something wonderful how the good things disappeared from before them.

The afternoon meeting was held at the picnic grounds. Prof. Swatman was present with his violin, giving an exhibition of his wonderful skill with the bow.

After a song by the choir Dr. Carter was called upon to give a talk upon Physiology and hygiene. The doctor handled his subject with the skill of a master and all present enjoyed the talk and the many good words of advice given.

The address by Prof. Horner on "The Teachers and Their Duties" and his recitations were greatly enjoyed. The Professor is ranking among the foremost speakers of the state. His name is found on nearly if not all of the educational meeting programs.

The recitations given by the young people were good. The names of the reciters with their subjects were not given the writer.

Much credit is due Mr. Goin and other persons of Waldport who greatly aided in making the institute and picnic a success.

A meeting of teachers, officers and patrons will be held at Waldport some time during the winter, says the superintendent.

Pacific Coast Indian Institute.

The Pacific Coast Indian Institute, which closed a week's session at Newport the 21st inst., was a successful and interesting affair. Eleven states were represented and 40 papers were read and discussed. These papers covered all the details of Indian training from childhood, both physical and mental.

Prof. W. P. Campbell of Chemawa was the able presiding officer, while Major J. J. McKoin of Siletz was the efficient secretary.

Fine music was furnished by the Chemawa Indian School band.

Miss Reel, the national superintendent of schools, complimented the various papers highly. She also stated that the head of the Indian department at Washington, D. C., was much pleased with the Coast schools, mentioning especially the Chemawa school, where 700 are being trained for the different walks in life. Miss Reel believes Newport is an ideal place for the Institute, the change from the heated interior to the cooling breezes of the grand old Pacific being very refreshing. She said if Portland could get the National Educational Association in 1905 the attendance would reach 20,000.

Among the interesting papers was one on social intercourse by Dr. J. D. Wetmore of Toledo. Not being a civil-service employee, the doctor highly appreciated the honor of being placed on the program.

The people of Lincoln county have a just appreciation of such gatherings as an advertisement. It is a real kindness to the participants, also, to bring them to this favored spot. Next!

Cap's Cockatoo.

At the Waldport hotel Captain Wakefield has a very intelligent cockatoo a half century old. The bird is a brainy fellow that has his ears on what is going on. He sits on a perch when he sleeps, and the rest of the time busies himself with chewing stovewood, gnawing woodboxes, and doing such other devilment as it is only in the spirit of an inveterate talker to conjure. The Captain came home recently to find the activity of his talking bird surprisingly increased. Things were topsy-turvy as if the old Ned had turned loose. So the Captain took aside his clerical guest, who was visiting Waldport for the first time, saying the cockatoo had torn away one-third of the woodbox, and complained generally of the naughtiness of his pet bird, characterizing it as "a veritable example of spirited destructiveness." But the old bird, which has been in the family for forty years and jealously loves the Captain, continued without interruption breaking bark as busily as if working for wages in a tanyard till the Captain approached the stove, when, without lifting its head, it sulkily said:

"What in the h—! did you tell that for?"

The Captain immediately turned to the grinning clergyman in the vain hope of changing the subject; but he has since been wondering who used slang in the presence of his loquacious but knowing bird.

JAMES PLUMLEE.

By the Way.

There is more or less truth and logic in the old adage: "Where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise;" but really it is not easy to believe that the good people of several states recently visited by the writer are on intimate terms with that delightful sensation, that superlative degree of happiness defined as "bliss." True, they may have semi-occasional or even less frequent spells of the desirable condition, produced, perhaps, by artificial means, but the genuine, ever-present, real thing cannot be there. Nature alone can provide this. And Nature has been guilty of discrimination. Man is doomed to a life of toil, interspersed with such rest as he can obtain. If the accumulation of wealth, the mad chase after the mighty dollar, brings all the pleasure that a man desires in this world and atones for all the imperfections of climate and surroundings, that man can never appreciate Paradise. But there are a few humble persons in the world who love the beauties of Nature, the evergreen hills and valleys, the genial climate, the cool, sparkling mountain streams, the rivers and bays and the grand old Pacific, the fruit and flowers, the fish and game—the spot where every prospect pleases and only man is vile—just as he is the world over. Truly, there's no place like home—that is, if your home is in Lincoln county, Oregon.
